

Why do all our feelings about politics matter?

Jenkins, Laura

DOI:

10.1177/1369148117746917

License:

None: All rights reserved

Document Version

Peer reviewed version

Citation for published version (Harvard):

Jenkins, L 2018, 'Why do all our feelings about politics matter?', British Journal of Politics and International Relations, vol. 20, no. 1, pp. 191-205. <https://doi.org/10.1177/1369148117746917>

Link to publication on Research at Birmingham portal

Publisher Rights Statement:

(c) Sage 2018. Final version of record available at: <https://doi.org/10.1177/1369148117746917>

General rights

Unless a licence is specified above, all rights (including copyright and moral rights) in this document are retained by the authors and/or the copyright holders. The express permission of the copyright holder must be obtained for any use of this material other than for purposes permitted by law.

- Users may freely distribute the URL that is used to identify this publication.
- Users may download and/or print one copy of the publication from the University of Birmingham research portal for the purpose of private study or non-commercial research.
- User may use extracts from the document in line with the concept of 'fair dealing' under the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988 (?)
- Users may not further distribute the material nor use it for the purposes of commercial gain.

Where a licence is displayed above, please note the terms and conditions of the licence govern your use of this document.

When citing, please reference the published version.

Take down policy

While the University of Birmingham exercises care and attention in making items available there are rare occasions when an item has been uploaded in error or has been deemed to be commercially or otherwise sensitive.

If you believe that this is the case for this document, please contact UBIRA@lists.bham.ac.uk providing details and we will remove access to the work immediately and investigate.

The British Journal of Politics and International Relations

Why do all our feelings about politics matter?

Journal:	The British Journal of Politics and International Relations
Manuscript ID	BJPIR-1238.R1
Manuscript Type:	Original Article
Keywords:	Democratic disenchantment, Emotions, Hope, anti-politics, political participation, injustice

SCHOLARONE™
Manuscripts

View Only

1
2
3 In recent years, scholarly attention has focused on the effects of public disaffection with 4 representative politics, the rise of anti-political sentiment and the role of processes of 5 depoliticisation, professionalization, and consumerism (Dalton, 2004; Flinders, 2012; Hay, 2007;
6 Norris, 1999; Papadopolous, 2013; Stoker, 2006). This work is admirable in its efforts to take
7 citizen's feelings about representative politics seriously and to see them as significant for political 8 thinking and engagement. Negative and demotivating emotions and affects such as pessimism,
9 resignation and disappointment are identified within such accounts but other important
10 emotions could be investigated more clearly and closely. Drawing from the literature on 11 emotions and politics (Ahmed, 2004; Bloch 1998; Campbell, 1994; Nussbaum 2001, 2014; 12 Prokhovnik, 1999), the intent of this paper is to explore how a more sustained examination of 13 what emotions do in politics might contribute to our understanding of democratic 14 (dis)enchantment. I propose that there are some avenues which could be developed in the 15 literature on disenchantment. I argue that the motivating properties of particular emotions could 16 be explored in greater detail. The disenchantment literature provides an account of how 17 demotivating states such as cynicism, disappointment and pessimism arise via 'heightened'
18 expectations/negative perceptions and advocates the tempering of such expectations and 19 perceptions. Yet these solutions have consequences for other positive and animating sentiments, 20 such as hope, which may be stultified in the process. Recent literature has tended to focus on the 21 role of positive cognitions as animators (Stoker and Hay 2016; Stoker et al 2016) but emotions
22 can also usefully direct political action. Here, I suggest that Ernst Bloch's work on hope may be 23 a fruitful resource for the issue of demotivation. The literature has made significant strides in 24 seeking to understand the form and structure of disenchantment. Congruently, the content of 25 'ugly' feelings of citizens could be explored in greater depth and greater reflection could be given 26 over to the potential significance of some disenchantment.

27
28
29 In the first section, I summarise the treatment of emotions in key texts in literature on political 30 disaffection. Second, I examine an issue raised by efforts to resolve and respond to the problem
31 of citizen's negativity: the potential emotional and motivational consequences of such solutions.
32 There are merits to the arguments provided by disenchantment scholars; negative emotions may 33 certainly lead citizens to withdraw, act narrowly or intuitively, because emotions are a form of 34 reflection through which we perceive, appraise, judge and subsequently choose to act or not act;
35 they provide us with direction (Prokhovnik, 1999). Yet, solutions to this negativity should not 36 simply focus on deterring or reining in the possibility of feeling negative emotions, without 37 seeking 'to touch citizen's hearts and to inspire, deliberately, strong emotions directed at the 38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 common work before them' (Nussbaum 2014: 2). My discussion of the disenchantment literature
4 is underpinned by a sustained consideration of the qualities of hope. Thus, I propose that a more
5 progressive politics should seek to cultivate the principle of hope (Bloch 1998). This has five 6 qualities: (1) thin optimism; (2) creativity; (3) direction and drive (4) sustenance; and (5) practice.
7
8 In the final section, I examine another issue for scholars of disenchantment: a somewhat
9 agnostic attitude towards outcomes and issues of equality and justice. As such, I explore further 10 negative and ugly feelings, in addition to relevant negative cognitions, which warrant careful and 11 close attention, especially when directed at injustices which emerge from the representative 12 system itself.
13
14
15
16
17
18

19 1. The Disenchantment literature

20 Political disenchantment and political disengagement from politics is rife and representative
21 politics has lost its appeal so we are told (Dalton 2004; Hay 2007). Here, I seek to make explicit 22 the role of emotions in three prominent monographs which seek to identify and explain the 23 causes of disenchantment: Gerry Stoker's (2006) Why Politics Matters; Colin Hay's (2007) Why We 24 Hate Politics and Matthew Flinders's (2012) Defending Politics. These texts do not exhaust that 25 literature but they present core claims which I will discuss in the paper. I also examine the 26 developing co-authored work of Stoker, Hay and others on how citizens understand, think about 27 and orient themselves to politics (Hay and Stoker 2009; Stoker and Hay 2016; Stoker et al 2016).
28
29
30
31
32
33
34

35 The disenchantment literature detects an unprecedented, widespread dissatisfaction towards 36 representative politics within advanced industrial democracies which can be charted empirically 37 in feelings of distrust and contempt expressed towards politicians, falling participation in 38 elections, declining membership of political parties, and the negative, pessimistic and cynical
39 feelings citizens express about politics. Disenchantment is a source of great concern and 40 something which requires explanation and remedy. Explanations differ in emphasis but there is 41 consensus that (1) people's thoughts and feelings about politics matter in terms of their political 42 actions and (2) this is connected to shifts such as rising individualism, consumerism, 43 professionalization and globalisation, as well as a wave of cynicism propounded by the media.
44 The loss and lack of appreciation for collective forms of deliberation and decision-making is 45 bemoaned and portrayed as 'pathological'. Consequently, normative projects or 'antidotes' for 46 revitalising representative politics are developed.
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 The contributions of these texts are rich. The examination of the role of negative feelings and
4 affects, such as pessimism, cynicism and distrust, is less commonly applauded and yet is 5 enormously important. Here, authors argue that negativity leads citizens to become frustrated,
6 detached and then withdraw or disengage. Furthermore, the intellectual resonance of using Max
7 Weber's term, disenchantment, and the Weberian sense in which emotional, cultural, political 8 and economic processes are interwoven, is compelling. Although 'disenchantment' is not 9 employed to signify an inescapable cultural condition, the meaning of disenchantment as 10 disillusionment, rather than hatred or ceasing to care, is shared with Weber. In a state of 11 disenchantment, we are still moved by something, it still matters to us; although we judge it to be 12 unsatisfactory and would prefer not to hold such feelings about it. Disenchantment's opposite, 13 enchantment, suggests a delightful, fascinating, alluring or even magical experience. To be 14 enchanted is to be bewitched or held in wonder; to be kept under the spell of something radiant 15 or wonderful, whereas disenchantment is a traumatic or painful disengagement from a previous 16 experience, dream or fantasy. Defined by the Oxford English Dictionary as 'a feeling of 17 disappointment about someone or something you previously respected or admire', 18 disenchantment implies devaluation; one no longer believes that something is good or 19 worthwhile. This isn't a fleeting sense of disappointment but something which signifies a deep 20 change in condition – perhaps we once were enchanted, animated or even enamoured with 21 politics but now we have lost admiration and respect for it; it is no longer sacred (Hay and Stoker 22 2009: 226). A swift move from disenchantment back into a state of enchantment appears 23 unlikely, although it is possible to become animated by politics again.

24
25 Differences between explanations of disenchantment are worth highlighting. Stoker's (2006)
26 explanations are multi-dimensional: (1) significant external social shifts, such as globalisation, 27 have made politics more complex and challenging (58-67); (2) the professionalization and 28 specialisation of politics has distanced politics from the people (3) the media's portrayal of 29 politics has encouraged cynicism; and, more significantly and distinctively, (4) the public no
30 longer appreciate or understand the 'messiness' of collective decision-making (68-83).
31 Effectively, there has been a failure of political education which restricts effective responses to 32 new challenges. Stoker contends:

33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60
61
62
63
64
65
66
67
68
69
70
71
72
73
74
75
76
77
78
79
80
81
82
83
84
85
86
87
88
89
90
91
92
93
94
95
96
97
98
99
100
101
102
103
104
105
106
107
108
109
110
111
112
113
114
115
116
117
118
119
120
121
122
123
124
125
126
127
128
129
130
131
132
133
134
135
136
137
138
139
140
141
142
143
144
145
146
147
148
149
150
151
152
153
154
155
156
157
158
159
160
161
162
163
164
165
166
167
168
169
170
171
172
173
174
175
176
177
178
179
180
181
182
183
184
185
186
187
188
189
190
191
192
193
194
195
196
197
198
199
200
201
202
203
204
205
206
207
208
209
210
211
212
213
214
215
216
217
218
219
220
221
222
223
224
225
226
227
228
229
230
231
232
233
234
235
236
237
238
239
240
241
242
243
244
245
246
247
248
249
250
251
252
253
254
255
256
257
258
259
260
261
262
263
264
265
266
267
268
269
270
271
272
273
274
275
276
277
278
279
280
281
282
283
284
285
286
287
288
289
290
291
292
293
294
295
296
297
298
299
300
301
302
303
304
305
306
307
308
309
310
311
312
313
314
315
316
317
318
319
320
321
322
323
324
325
326
327
328
329
330
331
332
333
334
335
336
337
338
339
340
341
342
343
344
345
346
347
348
349
350
351
352
353
354
355
356
357
358
359
360
361
362
363
364 365
366
367
368
369
370
371
372
373
374
375
376
377
378
379
380
381
382
383
384
385
386
387
388
389
390
391
392
393
394
395
396
397
398
399
400
401
402
403
404
405
406
407
408
409
410
411
412
413
414
415
416
417
418
419
420
421
422
423
424
425
426
427
428
429
430
431
432
433
434
435
436
437
438
439
440
441
442
443
444
445
446
447
448
449
450
451
452
453
454
455
456
457
458
459
460
461
462
463
464
465
466
467
468
469
470
471
472
473
474
475
476
477
478
479
480
481
482
483
484
485
486
487
488
489
490
491
492
493
494
495
496
497
498
499
500
501 502
503
504
505
506
507
508
509
510
511
512
513
514
515
516
517
518
519
520
521
522
523
524
525
526
527
528
529
530
531
532
533
534
535
536
537
538
539
540
541
542
543
544
545
546
547
548
549
550
551
552
553
554
555
556
557
558
559
560
561
562
563
564
565
566
567
568
569
570
571
572
573
574
575
576
577
578
579
580
581
582
583
584
585
586
587
588
589
590
591
592
593
594
595
596
597
598
599
600
601
602
603
604
605
606
607
608
609
610
611
612
613
614
615
616
617
618
619
620
621
622
623
624
625
626
627
628
629
630
631
632
633
634
635
636
637
638
639
640
641
642
643
644
645
646
647
648
649
650
651
652
653
654
655
656
657
658
659
660
661
662
663
664
665
666
667
668
669
670
671
672
673
674
675
676
677
678
679
680
681
682
683
684
685
686
687
688
689
690
691
692
693
694
695
696
697
698
699
700
701
702
703
704
705
706
707
708
709
710
711
712
713
714
715
716
717
718
719
720
721
722
723
724
725
726
727
728
729
730
731
732
733 734
735
736
737
738
739
740
741
742
743
744
745
746
747
748
749
750
751
752
753
754
755
756
757
758
759
760
761
762
763
764
765
766
767
768
769
770
771
772
773
774
775
776
777
778
779
780
781
782
783
784
785
786
787
788
789
790
791
792
793
794
795
796
797
798
799
800
801
802
803
804
805
806
807
808
809
810
811
812
813
814
815
816
817
818
819
820
821
822
823
824
825
826
827
828
829
830
831
832
833
834
835
836
837
838
839
840
841
842
843
844
845
846
847
848
849
850
851
852
853 854
855
856
857
858
859
860
861
862
863
864
865
866
867
868
869
870
871
872
873
874
875
876
877
878
879
880
881
882
883
884
885
886
887
888
889
890
891
892
893
894
895
896
897
898
899
900
901
902
903
904
905
906
907
908 909
910
911
912
913
914
915
916
917
918
919
920
921
922
923
924
925
926
927
928
929
930
931
932
933
934
935
936
937
938
939
940
941
942
943
944
945
946
947
948
949
950
951
952
953
954
955
956
957
958
959
960
961 962
963
964
965
966
967
968
969
970
971
972
973
974
975
976
977
978
979
980
981
982
983
984
985
986
987
988
989
990
991
992
993
994
995
996
997
998
999
1000

Many citizens fail to appreciate that politics in the end involves the collective imposition of decisions, demands a complex communication process and generally produces messy

1
2
3 compromise. Politics is designed to disappoint – that is the way that the process of 4 compromise and reconciliation works. (10).
5
6
7

8 Public ignorance and individualism heighten the sense of ‘disappointment’, dismay and surprise
9 that is experienced when preferred outcomes are not met (9-10, 68-83, 203-4). These emotions
10 are converted into a pervading and corrosive cynicism about political processes and a lack of 11 trust for politicians, bred by academic work and the media, which leads to disengagement from 12 conventional modes of participation and the growing attraction of populist ‘anti-politics’ (118-13 145, 202). Negative emotions and affective states, such as cynicism or resentment, are presented
14 as something ‘dangerous’ (118), which disrupt our engagement. Viewing politics as a public 15 good, Stoker’s remedy is increased openness in representative politics; and an expansion of 16 participatory opportunities for ‘amateur’ citizens to engage, express their views and influence
17 public policy in a variety of forums (149-200). Emotions, such as trust and affinity, are discussed
18 positively and feelings of attachment, trust or inclusion are deemed to drive political engagement
19 and participation (2006: 96-97). Stoker argues that such feelings are motivated by the wider 20 community and that it ‘is possible to give people the opportunity to believe that they are part of 21 a wider civic identity built around their locality or sense of equal and shared citizenship’ (2006: 22 97).
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33

34 Hay’s (2007) explanations for political disillusion lay blame at practices and processes of 35 depoliticisation. Hay argues that the projection of instrumental motivations onto political 36 representatives, stemming from public choice theory, new public management and neo-37 liberalism, has led to the off-loading of responsibilities of decision-making to unelected officials
38 and the movement of issues from the public to the private realm, which depoliticises decision-
39 making (90-122). This scholarly and ‘domestic origin’ of depoliticisation must be connected to 40 the ‘global’ fatalistic ‘globalisation thesis’. For Hay, the shift towards globalisation is not as 41 important as widespread beliefs that elite state actors are powerless and have limited capacity to 42 act in the face of economic constraints (154). Hay argues that we should ‘politicize such 43 assumptions and seek to make them the subject of public deliberation’, acknowledging that ‘we 44 have a choice in the first place’ (161-2). Depictions of politicians as instrumental and perceptions
45 of powerlessness result from negative perceptions about human nature, politics and agency – 46 and, moreover, a failure to recognise these perceptions as choices due, in large part, to 47 ideological distortion (69, 161). Such pessimistic beliefs and cognitions rear negative feelings of 48 cynicism, distrust, and indignation about politicians and politics. Thus, Hay’s normative project is 49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 to develop a more positive conception of human nature and greater confidence in human
4 capacities for political action. Hay makes reference to hopefulness and optimism (6, 9, 161), trust
5 (161-2), cynicism (5-11), pessimism and its self-fulfilling effects (66-70, 153-156, 160), and there
6 is even a quick nod to a sense of betrayal felt by the 'alienated' in the empirical sections (46-48, 7 54) but there is little discussion of 'ugly' feelings such as disgust, outrage, and, significantly, given 8 the book's title, hatred.
9
10

11
12
13
14 Flinders (2012) purpose is to 'animate a sense of passion' (41) and confidence replacing 'the 15 politics of pessimism with a more buoyant 'politics of optimism' that adopts a more balanced 16 and proportionate view of politics' (3, 88) as something which 'delivers far more than most 17 people acknowledge or understand' (vii). The text is underpinned by a consensus notion of 18 politics that involves collective endeavour, dialogue and decision-making (5-6). Flinders argues 19 that pessimism, fatalism, low confidence and negativity towards politics (172-174) is generated by 20 incomprehension, ignorance and, in particular, inflated and unreasonable public expectations
21 (13-16, 34, 56-63), as well as the domination of particular interests including the market (64-88),
22 the media and scholarly work (142-169) which generate myths about politics and politicians. A
23 wider range of emotions and affective states are explored, including fear (112-119, 138-141), the 24 sense in which moral panics manifest both anxiety and hysteria (166-169), denial (89-109), and 25 the creation of a 'culture of contempt' by the media (148-154) that spreads cynicism and despair.
26 Such negative emotions are often depicted in need reining in and containment (34, 64), but 'ugly 27 feelings' are scarcely mentioned.
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37

38
39 The most recent work by Hay and Stoker has sought to understand further how citizens perceive
40 and think about politics in depth (2009: 227). There is much to admire in this work, especially 41 the innovative and imaginative use of research from psychology on cognition, the exploration of 42 interesting data sets, and the deployment of mixed methods (see Stoker et al 2016; Stoker and 43 Hay 2016). Yet, it is not only important to understand how citizens think about politics better but 44 also how they feel about it because it is the combination of thought and emotion, which provides 45 much political direction and motivation. This work still examines both but has a tendency to 46 prioritise thought over emotion and to imply, a little unfortunately at times, that emotions cloud
47 reasoning capacities. This seems to be a consequence of drawing attention to the heat and 48 intensity of some negative emotions. We can see this in the suggestion that citizen's intuitive 49 fast-thinking is more influenced by emotions and feelings; and the preferred slow-thinking is 50 both less so and remains more cognitively demanding (Stoker, Hay and Barr, 2016). The 51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 contention that slow-thinking is less influenced by emotions and feelings was not demonstrated
4 in focus groups in which emotions such as frustration, sadness and regret were still expressed (p.
5 14-15), although it may well be true that fast-thinking is rooted in raw or heated emotions which 6 then elicit quick reactions. If we are to continue to develop an understanding of the form and 7 structure of disenchantment, it is paramount that we extend the good work of the 8 disenchantment literature by exploring the interconnections between citizen's thoughts and 9 feelings.
10
11
12
13
14
15

16 2. The issue of emotion and political (de)motivation

17 The earlier accounts of disenchantment were primarily concerned with emotions that lead to 18 states of political demotivation. Disappointment is singled out as an emotion intrinsic to politics
19 and both Stoker (2006) and Flinders (2012) identify 'heightened disappointment' as a significant 20 trigger for disenchantment. The discussion follows Dunn's claim that politics has a propensity to 21 disappoint (2000) because there are winners and losers within any outcome. Stoker articulates 22 that politics: 'is inevitably destined to disappoint because it is about the tough process of 23 squeezing collective decisions out of multiple and competing interests and opinions' (2006: 1).
24 He also suggests that public disappointment is heightened by consumerism, selfishness and 25 individualism. People struggle with the idea that the 'final decision is not necessarily one of your 26 choice' and 'exit' after experiencing disappointment rather than continue to debate' (Stoker 2006:
27 69). The deeper point is that individualism, focused on the realisation of individual desires and 28 ends, necessarily cultivates deep disappointment which is less likely to be experienced positively
29 and this derails enduring participation (68-69). Flinders also laments the dashing of unrealistic
30 and inflated public expectations, leading to despair. The example he provides is that of Barack
31 Obama's 'hope' and 'change' presidential campaign in which Obama's advisers were said to have 32 been involved in a project of dampening down expectations in order to stall 'a vast mood swing
33 from exhilaration and euphoria to despair' (2012: 34). The implication is that we need to 34 circumvent our hope and prevent or limit our disappointment by demanding less and having 35 lower expectations about what can realistically be delivered by a government/state. In short, we 36 need to 'grow up' (Flinders 2012: 39). This is reminiscent of the work on 'emotion management'
37 by Hochschild (2003) – in this case, by reducing our demands and expectations we may protect 38 ourselves and avoid feeling crushing and unpleasant emotions, such as disappointment.
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53

54
55 There is both a logic and truth to elements of this account. The diagnostic element of emotions,
56 by which we appraise, attribute salience or value to something (Jaggar, 1989; Prokhovnik 1999;
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 Nussbaum 2001; Freedon, 2013), has been recognised. The account can be aligned with the 4 Aristotelian treatment of pathe or passions in which pathe are explored in terms of triggers,
5 objects and consequences (1991). The trigger for disappointment, high or unrealistic
6 expectations and individualism, has been identified. The object of the disappointment is the 7 desired policy outcome which has not been met through the process of engagement. The 8 consequence of severe disappointment and dismay is cynicism and pessimism which may lead us
9 to withdraw and retract from others. It is well established that particular emotions (i.e. despair, 10 disgust, contempt, cynicism, pessimism, shame, guilt, hopelessness, ambivalence) have the 11 propensity to be demotivating, or, at the least, preclude certain forms of action (Nussbaum 2001, 12 2014). The solution that dangerously high expectations should be reined in, limiting 13 disappointment, also follows psychologically. Disappointment entails sadness and unfulfilled 14 hopes, as well as coming to terms with an often unanticipated reality that one can do little to 15 change. As unpleasant, it is a commonly avoided and displaced emotion that is substituted with 16 others. For example, the patient in remission from cancer who learns that the cancer has 17 returned may feel anger, misery, pessimism and frustration, wallowing in the thought that 18 ‘nothing will work: this is going to kill me’ because it is easier than confronting the 19 disappointment that they feel. However, numbing or displacing certain emotions and managing 20 expectations in these personal ways in relation to something that the individual has little capacity 21 to influence is very different to emotion management in respect to political expectations and 22 goals.
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36

37 Tempering expectations may perversely undermine some emotions which motivate the more 38 positive political engagement that scholars would seem to want to inspire. In other words, some 39 motivating emotions, such as hope, may rely on raised expectations. This isn’t to disagree with 40 the view that currents of individualisation may heighten expectations in a way that could 41 exacerbate extreme disappointment, bitterness and depression, but my concern is (1) lowered
42 expectations might lead to states of pessimism or accommodation; (2) that strong emotional 43 inspiration for political action could be lost in seeking to lower expectations; and (3) lowering 44 expectations is a somewhat unemotional, rationalised solution to a public emotional problem.
45 First, if we are to ‘remedy’ demotivation, we need to look carefully at the connection between 46 particular emotions and political motivation, commitment and sustenance (Prokhovnik 1999).
47 Thus, we cannot afford to neglect the impact of our solutions on action-guiding and sustaining
48 emotions that could be derailed. Lowered, ‘more realistic’ expectations might also manifest in 49 states of pessimism, nonchalance, resignation or ambivalence through which we accept reality as 50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 given and do not aspire either towards the creative work of dreaming of, or towards realising,
4 particular courses of action.
5
6

7
8 Second, expectations/demands are not the same thing as dreams but they are closely connected.
9 If we are too guarded, dispassionate and pragmatic in our expectations, it could limit our will and 10 lead to adapting to a situation. Crudely, does it matter if Martin Luther King's 'dream' and 11 'demands' were unlikely to be realised in full if it facilitated the persistence of (collective) hope in 12 justice and activism? King's rhetoric has intrinsic emotive and inspirational value in the way in 13 which emotions can provide political direction and motivation (Prokhovnik 1999). Rhetoric which 14 raises hope, in the face of the injustice of the suffering of black Americans during the Jim Crow 15 era, would seem more likely to foster stronger commitment to racial equality than lowered but 16 more realistic expectations of what can be achieved within political systems. Without the bold 17 imagination, hopeful rhetoric, raw emotions, high expectations and passionate struggle of 18 prominent campaigners facing great risks, obstacles and suffering, is it likely that the suffrage
19 would have been extended, slavery abolished, national independence achieved for colonised
20 states, apartheid defeated in South Africa, and so on? This is because hopeful expression tends to 21 both galvanise and sustain people's engagement in politics. This point is recognised by Hay at 22 least. Indeed, possibly drawing on Gramsci, Hay notes that hope is an endearing and positive 23 feature of politics.
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33

34
35 [It] is testimony to a certain triumph of the human will over human capabilities... (and) a
36 degree of political animation and engagement that has arguably... served to elevate levels 37 of political participation (2007: 6).
38
39
40
41

42 Finally, it is not convincing to suggest that people are more likely to continue to engage in 43 politics if they reason calmly and slowly that they might not 'win' every time, rather than if they feel 44 impassioned in some way, whether through anger, hope, trust, confidence, sadness, shock,
45 compassion, and so on. In some cases, it is important to (continue to) feel enraged at an injustice
46 or saddened by another's suffering. Indeed, these strong feelings may supply us with the 47 determination and resilience to follow courses of action through and not withdraw. As 48 Nussbaum argues, we are not automatons who will be persuaded by the most rational political 49 arguments and principles, we are enthused, touched, affected and moved by things to which we
50 establish significance; thus, we need to care about our visions and our goals (2014: 10). Emotions
51 can be intense, life-changing, overwhelming and we can feel frightened, floored or swept away by 52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 them. They cause ‘upheaval’ but they also provide us with many salient insights which inspire,
4 motivate and sustain us in our goals (Nussbaum 2001). For example, our reaction to a 5 photograph of a drowned toddler refugee – shock, disgust, grief, horror, outrage, shame or 6 hostility - moves us to engage in emotional reasoning. We may collectively ask questions about 7 the ‘softness’, ‘harshness’ or ‘humanity’ of EU and member states’ migration policy and to act in 8 ways related to those powerful emotions.
9
10
11 12

13
14 Demotivating stances, such as pessimism, are directly countered by authors such as Flinders 15 through the cultivation of optimism which seeks to give people ‘confidence... in their collective 16 capacity to change the future’ (2012: 138). This is, of course, very important for political 17 engagement yet it would be helpful to be clearer about the form of optimism advanced.
18 Optimism is a cognitive state which assumes a positive disposition. It can take some of the 19 following, non-exhaustive forms: a perspective that (1) the actual world is the best; (2) good 20 rather than bad things always happen; (3) good things can, will and do happen; (4) wishing for or 21 aspiring to something better or (5) a belief that things could be otherwise. Of these, it could be 22 noted that the first two involve certainty, confidence and cheerfully celebrating the status quo.
23 This is both congenial and uncritical. Indeed, the first three are not only bland but could be 24 ‘cruel’ in promising an unachievable fantasy or impossible ‘good life’ (Berlant 2011) and have the 25 potential to be blind or oblivious to existing problems. Stoker quite rightly recognises the 26 problems of ‘cruel optimism’ in his concerns that ‘politics would still struggle to achieve all that 27 people hope from it’ (Stoker 1996, 70). Further issues with (1), (2) and (3) is that the expectation
28 that positive outcomes will emerge can, as Elshtain notes, ‘easily slip into arrogant triumphalism’
29 (1999: 532), insulation from loss or injustice, as well as failing to take seriously, dismissing or 30 silencing anger, injuries, injustice and grievances. There is a danger that the disenchantment 31 literature advances in this direction at times in their enthusiasm for the value of collective 32 decision-making and, in a sense, democratic politics, processes and institutions as they stand. We 33 can see this in some of Flinders’s discussion of the civilising nature of democracy which ensures 34 the reconnection of ‘people to a collective fate’ (5, 66). Form (4) is somewhat wistful and dreamy
35 in its supposition that somehow things will turn out to be better. Form (5) is the thinnest form
36 and can be detected in the disenchantment literature in its crucial attack on ‘ideological’ 37 processes of depoliticisation, which deny or dismiss possibilities for action (Hay 2007; Hay and 38 Stoker 2009; Jenkins 2011; Bates et al 2013; Wood 2013). In retaliation, Hay directs his optimism
39 towards human nature, politics, and the prospects for change (Hay, 2007: 9). This concurs with 40 Doug McAdam’s contention that ‘cognitive liberation’ is necessary for protest in which people 41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 have to 'believe something is both unjust and subject to change' (1982: 34). Animating belief in 4 contingency is certainly fruitful but we could also examine particular emotions that inspire this.
5
6

7
8 My argument is that seeking to cultivate the emotion, hope is as crucial a response to 9 demotivation and disenchantment as 'cognitive liberation' and stimulating optimism.
10 Furthermore, employing Ernst Bloch's work on hope as not yet is helpful for this task.
11 Understanding the meaning of hope can dignify legitimate concerns about cruel optimism,
12 disappointment, demotivation and the limits of pessimism found in the disenchantment
13 literature, without undermining the expectations on which hope rests, or somewhat triumphantly
14 praising the status quo. Although some qualities of hope are noted in the disenchantment
15 literature, others are missed. Thus, I contend that genuine hopefulness has the following 16 properties: (1) thin optimism; (2) creativity; (3) direction and drive; (4) sustenance; and (5)
17 something which requires education in its practice.
18
19

20
21 Hopefulness is 'thinly' optimistic (critical-militant optimism in Bloch's terms (1998: 199), 446) as it
22 is based on the belief in the contingency of reality. In Bloch's words, 'no thing could be altered
23 in accordance with wishes if the world was closed, full of fixed, even perfected facts' (Bloch 24 1998: 196). The hopeful conceive of the world as unfinished and incomplete as 'the world is full 25 of propensity towards something, tendency towards something, latency of something, and this 26 intended something means fulfilment of the intending' (18). Indeed, hopefulness only makes 27 sense on the condition that either desired or undesired outcomes are possible. This 28 indeterminacy can be a crucial factor in inspiring people to realise something that is not yet. There
29 is a degree of optimism in the sense that the hopeful believe that things could be otherwise, 30 without assuming that everything will turn out well or for the best. This element of hope has 31 already been deployed within existing critiques of processes of depoliticisation.
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44

45
46 Second, hope is creative and focused. It is not abstract, escapist, contemplative, or merely 47 fantasy, or wish, although it does emerge from the human desire to dream about something else, 48 something better. Bloch and Paulo Freire both argue that day-dreaming is an important human 49 quality that we should not stifle. For Freire, 'dreaming is not only a necessary political act, it is an 50 integral part of the historical-social manner of being a person... there is no change without 51 dream, as there is no dream without hope' (Freire 1994: 81). For Bloch, 52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 [the day-dream] is concerned with an as far as possible unrestricted journey forward, so
4 that instead of reconstituting that which is no longer conscious, the images of that which 5 is not yet can be fantasised into life and into the world (Bloch 1970: 86-87).

6
7
8 Lowering expectations could stifle this critical creativity.

9
10
11 Moreover, third, hope gives us direction and underpins action; it moves us forward or outward.
12 Bloch describes hope as informed by a concrete rather than abstract utopia (Bloch 1998: 197)
13 which impels us to action because it is anticipatory. Hope 'goes out of itself, makes people broad 14 instead of confining them' (Bloch 1998: 3). Through anticipating other/better worlds, we 15 attempt to realise them. Indeed, hope provides drive, accompanies action and agency and 16 commitment, as it is 'an attitude towards the course of action that the agent is embarking on'
17 (van Hoofft 2011: 28). Without 'anchoring in practice' and taking action, through which we 18 become educated in hope, hope swiftly slips towards hopelessness and despair (Freire 1994: 2-3).
19 The presentation of hope as romantic and dreamy (Flinders 2012: 62; Stoker 2006: 143-144)
20 misrecognises the sense in which hope is simultaneously active and creative. Bloch's 21 understanding of hope sees it as a human need to venture beyond and accomplish something not 22 yet: it is willful, not wishful (Levitas 1989).
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31

32 Fourth, hopefulness is self-soothing and sustaining. As Lasch argues, it makes little sense to trust 33 in life if one hasn't suffered disappointment before but 'the knowledge that the future holds
34 further disappointments demonstrates the continuing need for hope' (1991: 81). Hope is distinct 35 from confidence because it is not certain, presumptuous, or naïve, although it is resilient. Rather,
36 we direct our hope towards courses of action which are not easy, not entirely within our control,
37 and in which we are vulnerable. Consequently, unlike cruel optimism or supreme confidence, 38 hope can survive dangers, such as disappointment, as it engenders sustained and committed 39 engagement. Disappointment might be a crucial process of learning or an animator for the 40 hopeful. This is because hope fortifies and sustains us. Hope is that emotion which gives us
41 strength and allows us to continue when things look at their bleakest, or the struggle becomes 42 long and arduous. In dark moments in our lives when despair starts to creep in, hopefulness can 43 always spring forth and it protects us. We need the soothing that hope provides accompanied 44 with the liberation and energy of optimism. We can see this in responses of the 45 chronically/critically ill and inspirational political campaigners or prisoners: holding hope means
46 refusing to be annihilated by a prognosis, crushing loss, heartbreak or great injustice. This 47 courageous stance facilitates strength, limiting the likelihood of withdrawal or resignation.
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3
4 Finally, Bloch is very clear that the exercise of hope requires education; we need to learn hope.
5 Hope is teachable but also entails practice: we have to actively jump in at the deep end and 6 'throw' ourselves into it (Bloch 1998: 3). Practising hope invites us to shed emotions: to lose fear
7 and despair. Through attempting to realise our hopes, we learn what works and does not work in 8 a particular instance and, drawing on hope, we can propose another not yet possibility. This 9 learning can also take the form of directing hope towards different objects – for example, hope 10 can be transferred from an emphasis on survival/cure to one of pain relief, the prospect of 11 spending time with loved ones and communicating beliefs, desires and wishes, or completing 12 projects (van Hooft 2011). As Bloch argues:

13
14 Nobody has ever lived without daydreams, but it is a question of knowing them deeper
15 and deeper and in this way keeping them trained unerringly, usefully, on what is right. Let 16 the daydreams grow even fuller, since this means they are enriching themselves around 17 the sober glance; not in the sense of clogging, but of becoming clear. Not in the sense of 18 merely contemplative reason which takes things as they are and as they stand, but of 19 participating reason which takes them as they go, and therefore also as they could go
20 better. Then let the daydreams grow really fuller, that is, clearer, less random, more 21 familiar, more clearly understood and more mediated with the course of things (1998: 3-22 4).

23
24 If we are concerned by disenchantment, we might want to cultivate and inspire hope. Hope can 25 bridge the tensions between demotivation and motivation as it is thinly optimistic, creative,
26 directional, resilient, sustaining and can be improved through learning. Hope should not be 27 reduced to an immature optimism or a confident disposition, unaware of difficulty or struggle.
28 Hopefulness is a refusal to give up on the idea of transformative action; on the idea that reality is,
29 in some senses at least, ameliorable. My recommendation for hope has been abstract but it is 30 important to note that hope, and other emotions, need public cultivation. We need to be inspired 31 and encouraged turn new possibilities into new realities, thus some words about Martha
32 Nussbaum's recent work on the cultivation of love (2014) may help to rectify Bloch's relative 33 silence on how hope could be inspired.

34
35 Nussbaum contends that emotions need public cultivation within nation states in order to 36 provide strong commitment and motivation towards common and key goals, such as the goal of 37 justice, equality, inclusiveness and so on (2014). Furthermore, all goals need continued emotional 38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 support to ensure stability over time; it is not enough to enshrine good principles, such as racial
4 equality, in laws and institutions; these can be a 'beacon of hope and protection' but need
5 emotional renewal and nourishment (316, 134). Indeed, some emotions need to be engendered
6 publically in order to guard against darker forces that undermine goals, such as disgust, envy,
7 hatred, greed, the desire to inflict shame, humiliation, stigma, which lead to or reinforce deep
8 divisions, hierarchies, inequalities and injustice (2-3). Nussbaum proposes two mechanisms for 9 the public cultivation of emotions: (1) a robustly critical education, which promotes love of the 10 full and equal humanity of all citizens; and (2) a patriotic culture, which is creative, directed 11 outwards and can generate inspiration by giving space to works of art, poetry, narrative, music, 12 films, photos and the rhetoric of great leaders, drawing on historically contextual memories and 13 symbols (200-4). Hope could be developed within these mechanisms, as could trust, something
14 that Stoker and Hay have both recommended.
15
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23

24 For Nussbaum, love, sympathy and compassion incites justice as these emotions enlarge an 25 individual's imagination and 'circle of concern' (11); meaning that the wellbeing and vulnerability
26 of all citizens' begins to matter to us. Love entails deep connection and attachment to another
27 insofar as it 'breaks down boundaries between people' (Nussbaum 2001: 463). Loving people
28 often means being better than we usually are and, thus, extended compassion and sympathy
29 aspires to justice, care and bridging the gaps between imagination and principles (2014: 142).
30 Drawing this together with an extension of hope, Nussbaum concurs that such a project does 31 not mean developing a triumphant patriotic political culture which is complacent: '(s)triking the 32 right balance between aspiration and acceptance is one of the most difficult and delicate tasks of 33 political life....But the right balance cannot be one that erases the longing for justice' (117).
34 Achieving this balance seems to be at the root of efforts to 'revitalise politics' (Hay and Stoker 35 2009) and to develop an appreciation of collective decision-making. Thus, attention to the public 36 cultivation of emotions could be useful for these normative projects.
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46

47 3. Recognising ugly and negative feelings

48 The disaffection literature accounts for disenchantment towards representative politics as arising 49 from negative feelings of disappointment, pessimism, frustration, sadness, regret, resentment,
50 and cynicism. This misses the articulation of some 'ugly' feelings such as alienation, disgust, 51 hatred, envy, shame, humiliation, paranoia, fear, etc. In what follows, my contribution is to 52 expand the content of feelings of disenchantment; briefly exploring two ugly feelings: alienation
53 and disgust; and two negative feelings: hatred and anger. I aim to show why it is important to 54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 understand a wide range of citizen's feelings as well as thoughts about politics. This section is not
4 informed by primary research but it seeks to open a gap for this in emerging projects of 5 understanding citizens thinking. I claim that it is important to distinguish analytically between the 6 trigger, the presence of the emotion and its object or direction. Finally, I suggest that revitalising
7 democratic politics may require paying more attention to issues of justice and equality. Negative
8 feelings about unequal and unjust political outcomes within advanced liberal democracies may be 9 warranted. Given the asymmetrical distribution of financial hardship and suffering across most 10 Western democracies, it is certainly plausible that political disengagement may arise from 11 injustices complicit within representative politics (Tormey 2015: 29).
12
13
14
15
16
17

18
19 Alienation is a feeling of isolation, dejection, loneliness, meaninglessness, despair, loss of 20 autonomy and powerlessness and can be expressed differently – hostility, lethargy, shame, etc.
21 Alienation is often, but not always, connected to oppression and poverty in terms of income, 22 capabilities and wellbeing. Most research on political engagement notes its differentiation by 23 socio-economic-cultural factors (Norris 1999; Stoker 2006; Hay 2007). Thus the poorest, most 24 marginalised and alienated in society are among the least likely to engage politically. Furthermore,
25 there is a clear link between the loss of social citizenship rights and the exercise of political rights
26 (Lister 2003). The loss of material well-being for a poor lone mother, for example, can lead to 27 financial insecurity, hunger, time poverty, but also shame, corrosive stigma, exclusion, indignity, 28 lack of autonomy, difficulties in participating fully in society, and a sense of despair and 29 powerlessness about the prospects of change. Poverty and alienation bring further inward feelings 30 of humiliation, sadness and desperation. Consequently, the disenchantment of some (e.g. the 31 alienated) might well be understandable. This negativity should not be dismissed as unfounded, 32 resting on high or unrealistic expectations, selfishness or cynicism, as it is most likely based on 33 diminished capabilities and wellbeing. To cast it as such is to ignore real concerns with 34 democratic politics.
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46

47 The problem is that the solutions of the disenchantment literature (cultivation of optimism, 48 revival of political institutions, or furthering of civic education) appear to remain somewhat 49 agnostic about situations of justice and inequality within democratic politics. This is because the 50 literature has tended to focus on the intrinsic value of collective decision-making, at the expense
51 of the outcomes of politics. Groups of poor, alienated citizens who are also marginalised and 52 stigmatised – for example, welfare or food bank claimants, groups of migrants, poor lone 53 mothers, disabled people, the economically inactive, whose lives have been made worse by, for 54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 example, stringent and unjust austerity measures – may hold clear grievances towards a political 4 system which has failed to protect or nurture them. This disenchantment is not born from 5 misplaced or naïve negativity. As such, considering a range of emotions, as well as cognitions, in 6 disenchantment helps to avoid the potential pitfall of emotional dismissal, preventing ‘uptake’
7 (Campbell 1996; Spelman 1989) of the deep and warranted despair, frustration, anger,
8 disconnection, of some citizens. My argument is not that the disenchantment of the alienated
9 should merely be accepted as legitimate because this may reinforce powerlessness. Instead, it
10 would be better to recognise that disenchantment has further sources and to seek to inspire or 11 cultivate particular emotions. We could take inspiration from the radical pedagogical projects of 12 Paulo Freire who worked with peasants in Brazil to develop emotions of hope and anger
13 oriented towards the political situation (2014), or the consciousness-raising methods of feminists 14 who rejected the depiction of emotions as ‘white noise’ to be silenced or pathologised and aimed 15 to transform inward emotions of depression, shame, guilt, and fear, experienced by sexual 16 survivors and others, into active emotions, such as anger or hope, which could spark political 17 resistance (Fraser 1996; Hercus 1999).
18
19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28

29 Further to alienation, Disgust is an ugly feeling which entails revulsion, abhorrence, aversion, or 30 repulsion; it may involve recoiling from an object, a fear that an object may contaminate or infect
31 us, or a horror regarding ‘filthy’ or ‘foul’ bodily functions or objects (Watt Smith 2015). In a 32 political context, feelings of disgust repel or sharply divide us from other groups, leading to 33 exclusion, stigmatisation and marginalisation (Ahmed 2004; Nussbaum 2001). Nussbaum argues
34 that disgust has an ‘unreasonable’ thought content, ‘embodying magical ideas of contamination 35 and impossible aspirations to purity, immortality, and nonanimality that are just not in line with 36 human life as we know it’ (2004: 14). Ahmed concurs that fear of contamination is a prominent 37 feature of disgust as it ‘hence operates as a contact zone; it is about how things come into contact
38 with other things’ (2004: 87). Although disgust involves expelling or ejecting something thought 39 to be a pariah, employing the label ‘disgusting’ has particularly ‘sticky’ properties which create 40 value through repetition (Ahmed 2004: 92 -93). This repetition of disgust delineates boundaries:
41 i.e. those citizens who belong and those which are abject to the nation state. Disgust may coalesce 42 with other public emotions – for example, shame, envy, hatred, humiliation, resentment, fear and 43 indignation – which elicit different sets of political responses (Freedon 2013). Disgust directed 44 towards political elites or other groups, such as immigrants, ethnic minorities, lesbians, or 45 homosexuals, benefit ‘scroungers’, the ‘liberal intellectual elite’/experts, paedophiles, bureaucrats, 46 etc, might form a feature of people’s support for reactionary political parties or candidates. We 47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 can see elements of this kind of disgust, lack of affinity and distrust directed towards politicians in 4 social attitudes surveys. Another prominent example of disgust was in the 2002 French
5 Presidential Election in which socialist and social democratic voters held their noses or wore
6 clothes pegs when voting for the unpopular centre right incumbent, Jacques Chirac, in order to 7 express their disgust at the choice between Chirac and Jean-Marie Le Pen, a far right nationalist.
8 In these instances, disgust, rather than merely cynicism or pessimism, forms an element of 9 political disenchantment, even though engagement ensues. It is reasonable to assume that disgust,
10 as an emotion which entails aversion, may also inform disengagement from representative
11 politics (i.e. non-voting). Such examples imply that public disaffection for representative politics 12 is more variegated.
13
14
15
16
17
18 19

20
21 Nussbaum argues further that disgust is an emotion which requires public confrontation, 22 condemnation and countering; it is an illegitimate political emotion that forms political and 23 emotional divisions and often violence (2015). However, responding to disgust is a complicated
24 public issue which requires attention to issues of justice. To take a crude example, the disgust that 25 the poor, white, long-term unemployed, young man may learn to feel towards the immigrant
26 manifests in stigmatisation and division. On Nussbaum's reading, this needs to be publically
27 countered on the grounds that it fails to see full humanity in another, and surely it does. Yet, the 28 triggers for disgust - perhaps indignity, lack of opportunity or reward, alienation, shame - might be 29 something which requires compassion, understanding and debate, even if the target of the disgust
30 is unjustifiable. If our response fails to offer compassion and hardens into disgust or hatred, 31 hearts and minds are easily seized by reactionaries.
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39

40
41 Like disgust, hatred is often perceived as an illegitimate political emotion. Hatred is an intense
42 emotion led by a belief that a person, group or thing is a threat, danger or evil, as they violate
43 social norms (Ahmed 2004). It is often accompanied by a sense of disgust of the other. Aristotle 44 believed that the goal of hatred is not merely injury or pain, but annihilation; the ceasing of 45 existence (Watt Smith 2015: 133). In a political context, hate is frequently described as an attitude
46 which can be (publicly) 'incited' and is deemed to be morally or even legally transgressive. The 47 argument in Hay (2007) is that the public hate politicians because they distrust them and cast
48 them as self-interested and deceitful. Yet this, in many respects, side-steps the emotion of hatred
49 with the cognitions that inform it, and substitutes the depth of the emotion hatred with 'distrust',
50 'cynicism', 'pessimism', 'disaffection', and so on. Furthermore, there are important differences
51 between hatred of politicians, democracy, representative politics, outcomes of capitalist states, etc.
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 The tragic assassination of political figures might be informed by hate, encouraged by other
4 actors or prevailing political perspectives, and occurs when an outrage or injury is perceived.
5 This severe disaffection is often identified in deeply divided communities.
6
7

8
9 Finally, it is intuitive to expect that some disenchantment derives from anger. This is recognised
10 in the most recent studies by Stoker and Hay (2016) and Stoker et al (2016) in their examinations
11 of fast-thinking and populism but could be extended further. Although we may need to manage 12 its heat, anger is an important political animator, especially when directed at an injustice or injury.
13 Anger is important and should not be reined in or silenced because it signals that we care about 14 something and may have been hurt by something. The discontent and disenchantment of the 15 angry is not only seen in disengagement but also in participation. The target of anger may be 16 justified or it may be democratically counterproductive. For example, the indignation (a feeling 17 of anger) of some may inform support for reactionaries (Shorten 2015) and resentment may 18 inform support for populists (Stoker and Hay 2016). Yet anger has also been understood as a 19 crucial emotion for political mobilisation by feminist (Campbell 1996; Spelman 1989) and social 20 movements literature (Jasper 1989; Lyman 1981). More significantly, it can be hard to express
21 and bear anger constructively as black feminist, Audre Lorde explains, without: (1) fearing one's 22 own or others anger (2) avoidance, (3) deflection, (4) defensiveness and (5) guilt (1994). The 23 disenchantment literature verges towards defensiveness at times when it encounters citizen's 24 anger. In places, the disenchantment literature depicts alternative forms of participation, such as 25 protest, as inauthentic and lacking intentionality. For example, Stoker bemoans the superficial, 26 authoritarian, expressive and ephemeral quality of protest activism; casting it as simplistic and 27 presentist in which 'the engagement stops precisely at the moment that politics is designed to 28 deal with, when conflicts are not clear cut and solutions are not obvious' (2006: 115). Yet
29 elsewhere he endorses the value of the 'Make Poverty History' campaign. It is plausible that 30 some protest action may be superficial but we are witnessing a burgeoning of unconventional
31 political participation which signifies something about conventional politics (Bailey 2014; 32 Tormey 2015). Anger may be an understandable response to contemporary political situations
33 varying from the injustice of austerity measures, the prevalence of sexual assault and rape culture,
34 the inadequacy of social housing, the domination of big business, climate change and militarism,
35 to name but a few. Anger, like alienation, might be deep, real, directed towards the injustices which 36 have emerged from the system and potentially justifiable. Protest could be formed in opposition 37 to individualism, atomisation, selfish hopes, negativity, processes of depoliticisation, and the 38 neglect of collective decision-making, moved by anger and hope.
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Conclusions

Research on political disenchantment draws attention to the significance of people's withdrawal from representative politics and examines a series of political emotions and negative cognitions. It has sought to understand the way citizens think about politics in depth and trace the link between this and their actions. This is important and valuable. I argue that we should also develop our understanding of the role of emotions in how citizens orient themselves towards politics and in efforts to revitalise politics. I seek to show that (1) there are a great variety of emotions involved in political disaffection which need careful explication, (2) we need to concentrate on cultivating particular motivating emotions (3) there is validity in the concerns of (some of) the disaffected, particularly when issues of justice and equality are concerned. Finally, I have argued in favour of a public cultivation of hope which may foster a robust and energetic disposition that can accept disappointments, provide sustenance and nourishment, recognise and promote indeterminacy, but is crucially rooted in practice. Future research could consider how emotions, such as hope, trust, and love, not only motivate us but sooth us, informing sustained political commitment. Extending our understanding of these processes better might allow us to move from states of disenchantment back into enchantment, or even love, again.

Bibliography

- Ahmed, S. (2004), The cultural politics of emotion. Edinburgh, EUP
- Aristotle. (1991) On Rhetoric. Oxford: OUP
- Bailey, D.J. 2014, 'Contending the crisis: What role for extra-parliamentary British politics?', British Politics 9(1), 68-92.
- Bates, S, Jenkins, L. and Amery, F. (2013) 'Depoliticisation and the Father's Clause Parliamentary Debates, Policy and Politics, 42 (2), 243-258.
- Berlant, L. (2011) Cruel Optimism, Durham: Duke
- Bloch, E. (1998) The Principle of Hope. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Campbell, S. (1996) 'Being Dismissed', Hypatia, 9 (3), 46-65.
- Dalton, R, J. (2004), Democratic Challenges, Democratic Choices. London: Chatham House .
- Dunn, J. (2000), The Cunning of Unreason. London: Harper Collins.
- Elshtain, J. (1999) 'Limits and hope' Social Research 66 (2), 531-43.
- Flinders, M. (2012), Defending Politics. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Fraser, S. (1996) 'Reclaiming our power, using our anger' in Women and Violence, Thorpe and Sydney, Hale and Iremonger.

- 1
2
3 Freeden, M. (2013) The Political Theory of Political Thinking. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- 4 Freire, P. (2014) Pedagogy of Hope. New York: Continuum.
- 5
6 Hay, C. (2007), Why We Hate Politics. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- 7
8 Hay, C. and Stoker, S. (1999) 'Revitalising Politics: Have we Lost the Plot?' Representation, 45: 3, 9 225-236
- 10
11 Hercus, C. (1999) 'Identity, Emotion and Feminist Collective Action', Gender and Society, 13 (1), 12 34-55.
- 13
14 Hochschild, A. (2003), The Managed Heart. Berkley: University of California Press.
- 15
16 Jaggar, A. (1989) 'Love and Knowledge: Emotion in Feminist Epistemology', Inquiry, 32(2),151.
- 17
18 Jasper, J. (1998) 'The Emotions of Protest: Affective and Reactive Emotions in and around 19 Social Movements', Sociological Forum, 13/3.
- 20
21 Jenkins, L. (2011) 'The Difference Genealogy Makes: Strategies for Politicisation or How to 22 Extend Capacities for Autonomy', Political Studies, 59(1), 156-174.
- 23
24 Lasch, C. (1991) The True and Only Heaven. New York: Norton.
- 25
26 Levitas, R. (1989) 'Educated Hope', Utopian Studies, 1(2)13-26
- 27
28 Lister, R. (2003) Citizenship: Feminist Perspectives. Basingstoke: Palgrave MacMillan.
- 29
30 Lyman, P. (1981) 'The politics of anger', Socialist Review, 11, 55-74.
- 31
32 McAdam, D. (1982) Political Process and the Development of Black Insurgency. Chicago: University of 33 Chicago Press.
- 34
35 Norris, P. (1999) Democratic Phoenix. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- 36
37 Nussbaum, M. (2001) Upheavals of Thought. Cambridge: CUP
- 38
39 Nussbaum, M. (2014) Political Emotions. Cambridge: CUP
- 40
41 Papadopolous, Y. (2013) Democracy in Crisis? Basingstoke: Palgrave MacMillan.
- 42
43 Prokhovnik, R. (1999) Rational Woman. London: Routledge.
- 44
45 Shorten, R. (2015) 'Reactionary Rhetoric Reconsidered' Journal of Political Ideologies, 20, 2, 179-200
- 46
47 Spelman, E. (1989) 'Anger and insubordination' in Women, Knowledge and Reality, London: Unwin
48 Hyman.
- 49
50 Stoker, G. (2006), Why Politics Matters, Basingstoke: Palgrave MacMillan.
- 51
52 Stoker, G. and Hay, C. (2016) 'Understanding and Challenging Populist Negativity Towards 53 Politics: The Perspectives of British Citizens', Political Studies, 1-20
- 54
55 Stoker, G, Hay, C. and Barr, M. (2016) 'Fast thinking: Implications for Democratic Politics', 56 European Journal of Political Research, 55, 3-21
- 57
58 Tormey, S. (2015) The End of Representative Politics, Cambridge: Polity.
- 59
60 Watt Smith, T. (2015) The Book of Human Emotions, London: Wellcome

Wood, M. and Flinders, M. (2013) 'Rethinking depoliticisation', Policy and Politics, 42, 2,151-170.

For Review Only

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60